GOP putting extremism before Kansas taxpayers

When I was governor of Kansas for much of the 1980s, both sides of the aisle focused on the success of our state. Sure, we had disagreements on how to attain success. But at the end of each day, I had no doubt our public servants were rooting for

No longer do I have such confidence. I'm vastly disappointed in mem bers of the current Republican Party in our state and their submission to extremism. They don't recognize their positions as an honor and privilege to serve. In fact, I don't believe the word "service" is even in their vernacular. We can debate ideology till the cows come home. But there is one word central to so many of our policy disagreements: taxes. That word cuts across all political lan guage. We all pay taxes with the understanding that we're paying for services we may or may not use We pay taxes so our police and firefighters are trained and ready to re-spond. We pay taxes for our children to get a good education and participate in our society so one day we can retire with things in good hands. We pay taxes so our roads are safe, and our parks function. Well, it seems we have a

My local Democratic candidate for the Kansas House, Kim Zito, has rightfully and thoughtfully resurrected the fact that the state government is not upholding its fiduciary responsibility to the tax-

This is an issue all Kansans who pay sales tax, who use roads and parks, and all Kansans who just received in the mail their 2022 notice of estimated ad valorem taxes must understand.

understand.
According to the League of Kansas Municipalities, local communities have lost at least $3.2 billion since 2001 because the government decided to stop funding demand

As Zito points out, the state's Local Ad Valorem Property Tax Reduction Fund is required by statute to transfer 3.63% of state sales tax revenue to coun ties and municipalities. In exchange, those local entities must reduce mill

Without this transfer of monies to communities, residents and property owners must make up the shortfall in order to balance local budgets. Take Manhattan, where my wife and I reside, for example. Our city's parks and recreation department is struggling to provide programs because of bud get constrictions — this, despite the projected 7.4% hike in property taxes.

Zito is well aware of the ongoing challenges that parks and rec has been facing, as she has a 5year-old son who's ripe for the department's activ ities. Likewise, Zito under stands the impact a prop-erty tax increase has on a household budget already under pressure, while income has remained flat.

Her tenacity to research the Kansas state government's obligations and subsequent dereliction of duties should be noted by every single resident and voter in the state.

She rightly accuses the party that has had control of the state Legislature for 29 years — 16 of those while also holding the governor's office ignoring a statute that's een around since the

This year marks the midterms, which usually see a dip in turnout. I urge see a dip in turnout. I urge all Kansans eligible to vote to be sure they're regis-tered, and to commit to casting a ballot in this election Nov. 8 (with early voting beginning Oct. 19). Brush away any partisan chips on your shoulders and take a true look at the issues facing your family, your household finances and the future for all gen erations on this plane

There's one party desperately trying to help Kansans, but it is over whelmingly outnumbered by the party that is desper ately trying to deceive us with manufactured mora

It's clear who deserves

John Carlin was Kansas John Carlin was Kansas' 40th governor from 1979 to 1987, and previously speaker of the Kansas House of Representatives.
He served as the eighth United States Archivist for 10 years, and is now a visitine pracfesor at Kansas visiting professor at Kansas State University.

Gorbachev saw the future in Missouri speech

BY SEAN N. KALIC

By the time Mikhail By the time Mikhail Gorbachev ascended to the supreme leadership of the Soviet Union in 1985, the lifelong communist had become convinced that one-party rule, the suppression of the press and aggressive militarism in Afghanistan were in Afghanistan were threatening the survival of the superpower. He set about changing that in hopes of preserving the Soviet Union, proposing the perestroika and glasnost policies that would so radically transform life in and out of the empire and out of the empire.

When he died on Tuesday at age 91, Gorbachev, the last leader of the Soviet Union, was widely recognized as a central figure in the complex and dynamic history of the end of the Cold War. When viewed from the contemporary prism of Russia's current aggressive military action against Ukraine and President Vladimir Putin's tight control over Russia and the Common-

Russia and the Common-wealth of Independent States, Gorbachev's legacy stands in stark contrast. Nowhere is that more clear than in the power message he shared right here in Missouri, just five months after dismantling the Soviet Union. The leadership at Westminster University and the National Churchill Museum in Fulton asked Gorbachev to speak at the 46th anniversary of Winston Churchill's famous "Iron Curtain" speech. Gorbachev presented his "River of Time and the Imperative of Action" address, where he out-lined Churchill's skills as a politician and spoke of the historic context of the Cold War. As he concluded, Gor-bachev established that he hoped the global commu-nity would remain com-mitted to "acting in con-cert on the principles of democracy, equality of rights, balance of inter-ests, common sense, freerights, balance of inter-ests, common sense, free-dom of choice, and wil-lingness to cooperate." With these words, Gor-bachev cemented his place as a historic figure in the history of the Cold War, and more important-ly as a champion of democratic ideas In tandem with the economic reforms he championed, Gorbachev also believed that the government of the Soviet Union had to move beyond its oppressive and controlling past, by allow ing more openness and participation in the political system. Glasnost and his demokratizatsiya policy served this objective, as Gorbachev championed the slow and deliberate relaxing of one-party rule and state control over the press. He believed his efforts were within the ideals of Maxist-Leninist ideology, which his gener-ation of politicians be-lieved had been corrupted and subverted since Sta-lin's rule. as Gorbachev championed and subverted since Sta-lin's rule. Viewed from within, Gorbachev's actions ap-pealed to a younger gener-ation in the Soviet Union, as well as its satellite na-tions. From the outside, U.S. President Ronald Reagan, West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl and U.K. Prime Minister Margret Thatcher supported Gorbachev's efforts at reform. They believed that his williangness to engage in frank and open discussion with the West on strategic, economic and social issues signaled a very different tone. Gorbachev's relationship with Western political leaders, specifically Reagan and Thatcher, produced a genuine friendship that transcended the ideology that had dominated the Cold War.

Cold War.
Though Gorbachev's efforts at reforms were welcomed by the West and by young people in the Soviet Union, he faced that by young Feepher in the Soviet Union, he faced stiff opposition from hard-liners within his own government. These traditionalists led an attempted coup in August 1991, in which they arrested and briefly detained Gorbachev in an attempt to make him resign. Gorbachev refused, and with assistance from Boris Yeltsin, he returned to Moscow. However, this internal struggle served to internal struggle served to accelerate the demise of the withering Soviet Un-ion, which Gorbachev dissolved in December

Hence, the memory of Gorbachev as a champion of democracy and free-dom blossomed in the aftermath of the Soviet Union, as the world recognized that the last leader of the Soviet Union strove to initiate economic and political reforms to pro vide more open and favor able opportunities within the decaying Soviet sys-

Sean N. Kalic is a professor Sean N. Kallic is a professor in the Department of Military History at the U.S. Army Command and General Staff College in Leavenworth. The opinions are the author's alone and do not represent the official position of the college, the Army or the Department of Defense.

OFF THE EASEL Lisa Benson

Water crisis in Jackson, Miss., a warning for all

BY LEONARD PITTS JR Miami Herald

There is no water in Jackson, Mississippi. Not at this writing, at

Not at this writing, at least. At this writing, the nearly 150,000 residents of the state capital have been advised that even if they are able to coax some of the precious liquid from their time, water pressure. they are able to coax some of the precious liquid from their taps – water pressure is feeble – it is unsafe for drinking, bathing, or washing dishes. Note, please, that they were already under a boil-water order – the latest in a series. Then heavy rains and flooding overwhelmed the primary water treatment plant in a city where some of the pipes date to the days Model T's still trundled dirt roads and bi-planes carved the skies. Gov. Tate Reeves was unable to say in a Monday night briefing when the situation might be rectified.

So there is no water in Jackson.

And Mississippi should be embarrassed. But Mississippi should not be surprised. To the contrary, it has known for many years that the city's water infrastructure was too old and brittle to serve its needs. They saw the crisis coming, but they did not avert if.

and brittle to serve us needs. They saw the crisi coming, but they did not avert it.

Mind you, because he was concerned about education that "aims to only humiliate and in-doctrinate," the governor did sign a bill making it impossible to teach "crit-ical race theory" in schools.

And because he wanted And because he wanted to "protect young girls," he did sign a bill barring transgender student athletes from participating in sports that correspond with their gender identity. And because he grieved "63 million babies" aborted since 1973, he did sign a bill banning almost all abortions.

abortions.

He acted to avert those "threats." But good luck getting a glass of water in "threats." But good luck getting a glass of water in Jackson.

All that said, this is not really a column about Jackson. Or, for that matter, water. It is, rather, a column about misplaced priorities. That seems a constant theme where people of color and poor people are concerned, so no one will be surprised to hear that eight in 10 Jacksonians are African American, while one in four is poor. Nor should it stun anyone to hear that experts say Jackson's woes grow from a sediment of white flight and malign neglect. When it came to making sure 150,000 people had water to drink, Mississippi had more important things to do. But then, poor and/or dark-skinned people are often taken for granted. Poor and/or dark-skinned people are also the ones who often function as the proverbial canary in the coal mine.

Thus, it is worth noting that while white flight and malign neglect are the foundation of this disaster, its proximate cause is sim-pler: freakish weather broke a decrepit system. And freakish weather, no to put too fine a point on it is not limited to poor peo-ple, Black people, or Jack-son. Indeed, climate change having been al-lowed to reach a state of daily crisis, freakish weath er is rapidly becoming daily crisis, freakish weather is rapidly becoming normal weather for us all. One wonders, then, how much longer we can continue misplacing priorities, embracing would-be "leaders" who focus on fighting culture wars, on offering the addictive sugar high of performative thrusts against despised Others ""Take that, critical race theory!" – even as pipes corrode, bridges age, the electrical grid fizzles, sewers clog, roads buckle and weather grows more freakish.

Here's an idea. How about if we required those who govern, i.e., to protect and maintain basic services and quality of life? How about if we valued simple competence over sugar highs? How might that be? See, there is no water in Jackson. And yes, that's an embarrassment for Mississippi.

But it's a warning for us

sissippi.
But it's a warning for us

SHORT TAKE: POOR PARENTS STEAL KIDS' LUNCHES?

From an Aug. 27 edi-orial in The St. Louis Post-Dispatch: Missouri is alone among the 50 states in preventing low-income kids who participate in a federal summer meals program from taking the food off the distribution site prem ises. This kind of callous stinginess toward poor children says much about the hard-hearted attitudes of the state's current leadership. The federal Summer meant to ensure that kids who rely on school lunch-es during the school year are able to get comparable meals when school is out. Low-income kids through-out the country used to be required to eat the meals on site, but during the on site, but during the pandemic, a "grab-and-go" option was added.

NBC News reports that just one state — Missouri — has declined to continue that program.
A spokesman for Missouri's Department of Health and Senior Services told the network the concern is that "if the children aren't there (on premises), you can't al-ways guarantee those kids are the ones getting the meals." So they suspect, in other words, that the parents are using the kids to secure these modest meals so the adults can eat them That's nonsense. Missouri's poor are, as usual, the last people on the minds of Missouri's Republican leadership. But they can still vote.

ALTERNATE IDEAS: Subscribers can find expanded editorial and commentary columns on the issues of the day in the eEdition's Xtra Opinion pages by going to kansascity.com/eedition.